PUNISHMENT OF SHACKLEFORD AND LAMAR

Dropped from Interstate Commerce Committee Because of Friendliness for Hearst.

Atlanta News.

The announcement from Washington that John Sharp Williams has dropped Messrs. Lamar, of Florida, and Shackelford, of Missouri, from the committee on interstate commerce, has behind it a story of some general interest to the Democratic party and the public.

John Sharp Williams is by the action of Saturday's caucus the once again leader of the Democratic minority in the house. He has a right to name the committeemen from the minority side.

Messrs. Lamar and Shackelford are two of the cleanest, ablest and most loyal Democrats in the house. Both are from the south; both are men of unquestioned ability, character and loyalty.

The crime of Messrs. Lamar and Shackelford consists in the fact that in the last congress they favored the Hearst railway regulation bill which in the judgment of a great many Democrats, is the best, clearest and most direct statement of the Democratic position that has been crystallized on this question. The Esch-Townsend bill and the Davey bill have both been framed in part upon the basis of the Hearst bill.

Mr. John Sharp Williams, the Democratic leader, is radical in his dislike of William R. Hearst, and lent the entire strength of his official position in the last session to suppress the bill of Mr. Hearst, and to deny it all currency and success as a Democratic measure.

The story comes from Washington that upon a vote in the last session in which some of the Democrats voted against Williams upon some proposition, he became very much incensed and threatened to resign the leadership of the party. While in the heat of this feeling he actually had sent around for signature a call for a caucus for the purpose of presenting his resignation.

Finding him in a cooler moment, some of Lamar's Williams' closer friends persuaded him of the great mistake that he was making in this hasty action and convinced him that it would be fatal to his future usefulness and repute. Mr. Williams, as the story goes, was so much impressed with the reasoning of his friends that he realized the necessity of turning this emergency caucus into another line and to revolve its action around another issue. Whereupon he seized upon the rate regulation issue. When the very clear and powerfully definite bill of Mr. Hearst was presented for his consideration, he positively refused to consider it because of his feeling toward Mr. Hearst, and hastily drew up a bill which was presented as the Davey bill to the caucus and which became by the caucus the representative measure of the Democratic party on that question.

Messrs. Lamar and Shackelford, who were thoroughly satisfied with the clear and definite provisions of the Hearst bill and had previously advocated it in the house, were, as they had a right to be, protestants in the caucus against this new and very hastily constructed Davey bill. Mr. Lamar also, who was on the interstate commerce committee, declared to Mr. Williams that while he would loyally support the Davey bill in the house, if it were presented as the Democratic measure, he would not feel justified in supporting it as a minority member of the interstate committee because of his superior belief in the directness and efficacy of the Hearst measure.

It will be remembered that when the Davey bill was presented in the house the basis of its construction became promptly evident, and the amendments which necessarily forced upon it were taken practically from the Hearst bill, which had been tabooed by the Democratic leader.

This is the story that is told in Washington and which will be reviled by the punishment which Mr. Williams has just meted out to Messrs. Lamar, of Florida, and Shackelford, of Missouri. There will be found many people throughout the country who will be inclined to sympathize with these distinguished gentlemen in this emergency, and who will also be disposed to question whether the assertion of individuality in the Democratic caucus should be punished when it is not carried into direct opposition to a caucus edict. There will be found other people to raise the question whether it is good policy for a Democratic leader at a critical stage in his party's life, to allow any personal prejudice whatever against individuals to interfere with a due consideration for a strong and definite measure carefully drawn and largely representative of the best sentiment of the rank and file of the party throughout the country.

Meanwhile, Mr. Hearst will immediately reintroduce the two bills on this line which he presented to the last congress, and it goes without saying that in view of a recent quite notable election in New York, Mr. Hearst will be of much greater force and have a much greater following in this house of representatives than he did in the last.
